@tic. revista d'innovació educativa (ISBN 1989-3477) invites you to submit articles for a special issue on Educational Innovation.

Articles must be based on one of the following thematic areas:

Among the different approaches, standpoints and perspectives in which innovation in teaching can be defined and recognised, in this occasion, we will pause to identify innovation with “good practice”, which makes the learning we are striving for more rewarding, easier or simpler; and the conditions in which it is developed. We will pay special attention to the description of the practices and to the institutional context itself that elevated it to the category of innovation. There are three areas in which contributions could be classified:

- Innovation in creating good practices for active methodologies in classroom teaching. By active methodology we mean the type of teaching approach which implies that students are involved in their own learning, either individually or in a collaborative manner.
- Innovation in good practices regarding the assessment of student learning, encompassing the difficulty that implies “going beyond the assessment of knowledge or dominating the concept” and starting to assess competence, group work and complex skills.
- Innovation in creating good practices for the integration of technologies in university teaching in its different potentialities, especially for learning through virtual contexts either as a support or supplement to “face-to-face” teaching or as a methodological and instrumental foundation for “out-of-class” learning.
